Juan Enricos

Born the son of a Brazilian taxi driver, Juan Enricos has become one of the best-known ballet dancers in the world and the only Latin-American principal dancer The 5 National Ballet in Moscow has ever had.

One of 10 children, Juan grew up in a poor part of Brasilia. By the time he was nine he was in trouble at school. His father decided to get him away from his group of friends. A distant relative was sending his children to ballet school and his father thought it would also be good for Juan.

10 Juan wanted to be a footballer. He thought ballet was boring and just for girls. But he changed his mind after he went to see the National Ballet of Brazil. He loved the way male dancers jumped and flew through the air. He started to work hard at ballet and when he was 17, his career began after he had entered a competition in Austria and where he came first out of 137 dancers.

15 Juan says that even poor boys like him can learn from the best ballet teachers in Brazil, which is excellent. This is because the lessons are free. Also, music and dancing are such an important part of life there that learning to dance is like learning to walk.

a) Read the text.

Leo Tozer doesn't have a very normal routine. He works in a nightclub, where he plays the piano in a jazz band. The club opens at 11.00 at night, but the members of the band usually get there at 9.00 and they practise for a couple of hours. The first customers arrive at about 11.15 and the show starts at midnight. It finishes at 5.00 in the morning. Then Leo and his friends have something to eat, before they go home. Leo lives quite close to the club, so he walks home. He goes to bed at 8.00, but he only needs about four hours sleep, so he gets up at midday. In the afternoon he watches TV or goes to the cinema.
